Fourth International Conference on MIGRATION AND DEVELOPMENT

Center for International Development, Harvard University, June 10-11, 2011

The Center for International Development (CID) at Harvard Kennedy School, The Harvard Center for Population and Development Studies, the French Development Agency (AFD) Research Department and the World Bank Development Research Group are jointly organizing the Fourth International Conference on “Migration and Development”. The conference is devoted to investigating channels through which international migration affects economic and social outcomes of developing countries. Possible topics include social networks and diaspora externalities, remittances, return migration, migration and the pattern of trade/FDI, brain drain, migration and institutional/technological change, migration and health, and the effect of emigration on poverty, inequality, and human capital formation in developing countries.

A selection of papers from the conference will be considered for possible publication as a special issue of The Journal of Development Economics.
